

Client Collaboration

What were the challenges faced in this project?

Typically, I find that the most common challenge in all projects is to balance the goals and desires of the clients, while simultaneously maintaining the architectural and design capacities. Every project we take on is a work of art—distinct and unique in its own way—and it's extremely important to keep the number-one priority encompassing that actuality. Being able to accurately and sufficiently get all of the mechanical and electrical systems into the existing building while achieving all of the design goals was definitely a challenging aspect of this project because in addition, we were faced with the difficulty of working in a tight neighborhood in the Back Bay. There was a constant stream of city life that we had to maneuver around and accommodate. But, with proper planning and time management, completing the project was a success.

How is this project unique?

One of the most exciting aspects for me in the work that I do is working one-on-one with the clients to achieve the design goals that they're looking for. It's so much fun to bounce ideas off of each other, and to hear design ideas that clients come to me with. Helping those goals come to life is even more rewarding and makes all the work worthwhile. Being a part of the transformation of this property and successfully transferring very unique designs from paper to reality made this project stand out from all others.

What do your clients appreciate the most about this project?

My team behind me is exceptional. They're poised, meticulous, and are able to efficiently get any project done under any conditions. I think what my clients appreciated most about this project was how it was handled. There's a constant flow of communication from president, to team, to clients, and we all are looking to achieve the same goal. The chemistry between every player is what allowed us to successfully complete this project. We are a company of high-achieving and focused individuals who are both balanced and compassionate, and that makes the process of building dream homes enjoyable.
